It wasn't that long ago that Marva Wright was a new voice on the New Orleans music scene. That is clearly no longer the case. Currently Wright is the Crescent City's most in demand artist. If she cares to she could work around her home-town seven days a week and she often does. However, Wright also spends a great deal of time performing at concerts and festivals in Europe, and across Canada and the United States. Born March 20, 1948, Wright grew up in the Carrolton section of New Orleans, next to the Mississippi River. Her childhood was centered around school, the playground, church and singing.

Wright's recording debut, Heartbreaking' Woman, released in 1987 on Tipitina's short-lived Oh-La-La label, was an artistic and commercial success; albeit confined to the New Orleans area. After the demise of Oh La La, Wright was approached by Aim Records and recorded I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For (AIM A2 CD), an excellent recording which helped expose Wright to audiences outside of the United States.

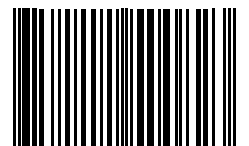

Via her recordings and live performances, Wright became one of the rare blues artists to attract listeners who really don't consider themselves blues listeners. Wright did (and still does) by combining pop, country, soul and rock into her recordings and her shows.
